DEDICATION

TO PEGGY.

Unseeing eyes! You cannot scan the leaf, Oh, silent lips; you cannot blame or praise,
But, to the memory of those glad past days, Before our laughter was gripped close by grief,
I dedicate the dream all unfulfilled,

Because of all the help your counsel gave,
I lay upon a heart whose pulse is stilled, Flower and thorn above my dear one's grave.

INTRODUCTION

ALPHA CENTAURI.

Alpha Centauri, the double star, is the chief pointer to the Southern Cross. Alpha is the finer of the two stars, the components being of nearly the same size, and so far apart that they can be seen through a good telescope.

It glows above our mighty sea-laved isle, Changing and flick'ring in the arch of God, Where miles and miles of grassy levels smile,
And where the unsung pioneers have trod.
Alpha Centauri! See the double star That gleams as one above the smoke-drift cloud, Above the groves of Redwood and Bethar, Or where the checked Pacific thunders loud.
Star of my home! When I was but a child, Watching, and fearful of the coming years,
You bade me learn the story of the wild,
You bade me sing it low to stranger ears!

* * * *

The star is dim, I bring to thee to-day
The star of poesy that fails to shine,

With all the warmth I meant to lend the ray,
To light the pathways of this isle of mine.
But come to me, oh! my Beloved, and look,
Another star I shelter in my hand;
Shut close between the pages of my book,
The Star of Love a woman bears her land!

THE VALLEY OF LAGOONS.

"I have dreamed of it at dawn," she said, "and under the great white moons;
I have thought of it at dusk," she said, "and longed in the summer noons, To find the path by the sandstone ridge, and over the granite hill,
By the ring-barked plain and the quaking swamp, where the pools lie deep and still—" Then, "Oh, come away with me," she said, "to the Valley of Lagoons!
We will ride on past the cockies' homes, and the gold green of the corn, And the blue-green of the lucerne patch, where the daisies white are born.
We will pass the curve of the chock-and-log, and set the slip-rails wide, Where the moss is deep on the unused road, together we shall ride;
And over the sweep of the prairie grass, and on to the yellow plain,
And up by the dreary spinifex, and out to the five-mile lane,

Past the hut where the shepherd died, who tired of God's bright sun,
The rotting beam where his body swayed, when the shameful deed was done, And past the black mark of the tree that was left by the ninety flood,
And past the wreck of the cockies' fence, sunk deep in the river mud;
And down by the children's bogey-hole, and over the shallow creek, Thro' the gate of the boundary fence, where they trapped the dog last week.
The sun will squander upon us both the wealth of his lavish noons, Till we find the road—so few have found—to the Valley of Lagoons!"

"And when we find the Valley," I said, "with its sheeted silver tides, Say, what is the boon that you will grant to the one who faithful rides, Thro' stifling scrub, and o'er rutted plain, and by ridge and road and creek?
Say, what shall I gain, who go far afield that unknown way to seek?"

She leaned across, and she laid her hand on my horse's jetty mane,
"What is a fairer thing," asked she, "than the picture of scrub and plain?
What could you crave beyond our land, with the flower-sweet afternoons,
And the wonder that the good God sets in the Valley of Lagoons?"

"The red of dawns that burn in the East, and the gold of suns that rise, Are nothing at all to me," I said, "compared to a woman's eyes,
And the white of clouds that were piled last eve like snow in the twilit west, Are not as fair as the milky curves that make up a woman's breast;
The blue that arches the heaven above, and the crescent moon that dips, Is not as dear as a woman's heart, nor loved like a woman's lips!"

Slow to her cheek the maid-red rose, and slow to her mouth a smile,
"God spread the beauties of earth," she said, "for many a sun-kissed mile;
But a woman! a year or two of charm, then grey hairs and the grave."

I answered, "But the woman for me, for that is the thing I crave!"

She rode a sleek brown station hack, with a bur...nished shoulder and side, A great black horse from the Wilga breed, was the one I picked to ride; They paced together with jangling bits, and my heart sang reckless tunes, As we rode out of the station street to the Valley of Lagoons.

'Twas morn when we set the slip rails down, and rode through the dew-wet herbs, And on the hurrying steeds of thought I set no galling curbs.

I thought of all that a man might think, and all that a girl might say,
All that my heart might chance to lose at the end of the ride to-day; Across the road, from tree to tree, where the slim gum branches swung,
The thick gold cord of a spider web from each polished bough was hung,
The scent of gum leaves was in the air, and ever again we heard The deep wild note of a joy gone mad in some unseen butcher-bird.
A swallow darted across the track, and, the soft green suckers through,
We heard the thud of a scattered mob of the swift red kangaroo;
And in the paddock the big brood mare was win-neying to her foal, And the 'possum fled, with upraised tail, to his cunning hiding hole;
And gay little wrens, with a flash of blue, hopped away from the horses' hoofs, As we left behind the woolshed gates, and the glint of the iron roofs.
'Twas noon when we found the secret path that led up the granite hill, And saw the hue of a fallen sky 'twixt the grey rocks smooth and still,
And heard the rustle of wooing wind that rippled the shimm'ring tide, And the weird whisperings of the reeds where the breeding black duck hide.

We saw the water lilies, pink as the blush of a bride divine,

She turned to me with a sudden cry, and nestled her hand in mine.

Lovers who sigh for a dimpled chin, the lure of a maiden's eyes,

Take horse, and ride with her by your side, if you are as lovers wise;

Till you find the place of the dream fulfilled—sought thro' so many moons,

For this is the home of peerless dawns, and rapturous afternoons.

Ride forth at morn by the scrub and ridge, and up by the granite hill,

By the ring-barked plain, and quaking swamp,
where the pools lie deep and still,

And find the way—that few find to-day—to the Valley of Lagoons.

I.

The blue sea skirts her slim, sun-ambered feet, Upon her mighty brow red gold is bound,
Upon her breast mimosa flowers press sweet,
And hills and forests lap her beauty round.

All day she lies and dreams; from sun to sun,
From moon to moon, she couches soft, secure,
And, as to catch grey eve the gold hours run,
She thinks her slumber can for aye endure—

Full happy dreams are hers, of prosp'rous days, Fleece-heavy flocks upon a green-fed land,
Of settlers' homes that lie in golden haze,
Of brother toilers moving hand in hand.

Of scented nights, when by the woota grove
The mopoke breaks the silence with his call,
And, o'er the slip-rail, love lilts low to love,
And Peace has spread her white wings over all.

So, filleted with matrix, opal, pearl,
And zoned with shimm'ring belts of ocean green, Where (true love gift to many a sun-browned girl), Hangs, link on link, a chain of olivine.

She sleeps, and winds come up and fan her hair, Between her fingers springs the waratah,
Her coverlet is twined with musk-buds rare,
And threaded leaves of redwood and belah.

All day the breeze sings to her maiden ears
A lullaby, like croon of scrub-hid doves,
And, rustling in the brig'low boughs she hears
The lusty bronze-wing boasting of his loves.

She sleeps—and shall we leave her to her dream?
The sun is very bright on hill and dale, O'er vine-hung rocks the silver waters gleam,
And moss lies all untrodden in the vale.

II.

They left her, where the purple mountains loom Untenanted, above the Northern seas, Rimmed round by palm, or fir of tufted gloom,
Or the stiff shoots of dry pandanus trees, Left her to rest in woodlands green and still.

The winds died down, and Nature seemed to wait,
And there was never watcher on the hill,
No guarding cannon at the Northern gate.

Only the silence of the great scrub heart,
Only the hush upon the great grey plain,
Where buttercups in sun-caught splendour start Thro' the fine veil of February rain.

There came a muffled stirring in the East,
From rock to rock a stealthy creature stept, Red war unleashed—a sullen, sateless beast,
To prey upon her beauty while she slept!

III.

Australians, will you leave your dear land, Maid of the sun, and Queen of the blue seas, To cringe 'neath an alien master's hand, to hug his feet, or fawn about his knees?

And will you let his savage, reiving touch mar the white beauty of your Southern maid, For she has trusted long and overmuch, to rise up shudd'ring, rifled, and afraid?

They murmur round the gates to East and West;
their footsteps echo in the halls of Strife, With hov'ring hand above her perfect breast, with sear of bullet, or red, sudden knife!

The smoke will rise o'er quiet settlers' homes, but not the smoke of peaceful hearths afar, But that which, smiting heaven's blueness comes, the horrid following of a bloody war.

Shattered before the screaming shell will lie the city buildings that you builded well, And, lifting ever to the arching sky, will float the echoes of the man-made Hell,

Clotted in the shrinking hearts of flowers, where, thro' cool aisles the tender North wind grieves, And Pomera its honey sweetness showers, men's blood will filigree along the leaves.

IV.

Do you think that you could thole it, Australian born and free, Where the call of many rivers finds an echo in the sea?

Do you think that you could bear to feel the chain that girds you round?

'Midst the chitter of the bell-birds in your happy hunting ground,

Will you die—or live to learn it, when the crucial moment comes,

And the crook'd and yellow fingers curve on unde-fended homes?

You might have the strength of Samson, be an Anak in the field,

Be a reckless "Death of Glory" boy, and scorn to pause or yield,

But the stag before the hunter's spear—he either sinks or runs,

And what help are brawny hands and bare—the other has the guns!

Let every unit find his place, a part of one great plan—

Australians must remember, 'tis the boy that makes the man.

Take the brown-faced laddies as they play along the street,

Let them listen to the rhythm of the steady marching feet,

Teach the keen young eye to sight the gun, the keen young hand to thrust,

Do not let the young glance waver, or the good steel barrel rust;

Let them play the game like soldiers, let them scout the lucerne field,

With the rifle at the shoulder, and their honour for their shield;

Let the lassies bind a token in the sun-kissed mountain glades,

For the bravery of laddies and the purity of maids!
Arm the empty North that drowns by its tide-washed sandy slopes;

There is iron in the ranges, there is silver in the stopes,

There is wealth undreamed—your birthright—in your country's scattered parts,

There is grit and honest courage in your people's loyal hearts.

Rouse them with your martial music, with your call
"To Arms! To Arms!"

From New England's cherry blossoms, to North Queensland's feather palms,

Would the man who swings a leg across the sweating outlaw's back

Swerve aside before the Maxim that is mouthing in the track?

The stuff is there—then train it—put the means within the hand,

Fate has given you a treasure to be guarded in your land!

Oh! the fair-maid country calls you, as she couches in the sun,

That you keep her honour stainless with the power of your gun!

THE BIG 'ROOS' FEEDING GROUND.

In the heart of the timbered country, where the boles of the trees show white, Where long leaves flicker above the grass in the hush of a moonless night, Where the Vandyke grass grows rank and lush, and the sweetest herbs are found, Lies the grassy sweep of the promised land, and the big 'roos'* feeding ground.

They steal thro' the red-gum ranges, and they fly past the splitters' camp, They spring down by the shallow crossing, and they circle the quaking swamp.
And they stand for a moment, front paws raised, bright brown eyes glancing round, Then off again, with a thudding tail, go the 'roos to their feeding ground.

And the men from the survey hear them, as they beat past the low white tent, And the pigeons wake in the iron bark, where the great dark boughs are bent;
And ere the peak of the topmost hill, by the eye of the dawn is found, They will take their fill of the grass and shrub in the big 'roos' feeding ground.

*'Roos—Kangaroos.

IN THE CHURCH.

They sang of Death and Judgment in the church,
A narrow wooden structure by the sea,
While outside sunlight shimmered on the sands,
And little laughing waves made melody.

Thro' a wide-open window, one wild bee Blundered against the cross of beaten brass, Dizzy from digging in lantana blooms,
Or dazzling flights across the sun-warm grass.

They sang of an unreal, revengeful God,
That pain was best—to grieve was dutiful—
And all the while the little, laughing waves Spoke of a world that Love made beautiful.

A SONG OF BLUE SKIES.

This is a song of blue skies,
And the far purple of hills, Vales where the mist legion dies,
As the red-shafted sun wills; Plains where the vinca is spread,
Brown of the nuts on the palm, Roof all unshadowed o'erhead, Seas that are sapphire and calm;
Pink tufted grass on the rise, Stirred by the wraith of a breeze—
This is a song of blue skies,
And the green glory of trees.

Do you remember a place, carpeted over with fern, Windblown leaves cast at your feet, grey trunks wherever you turn;
Moreton Bay ash on the right, guarding the gloom of your glade, Gold were the pools of the sun, black were the islands of shade.
Only yourself and the girl—only her heart and your love,
Only the fern underfoot, only the blue sweep above, Silence of noon in the air, and the far pipe of a bird, What you said, hurried and low, only the rustling boughs heard;

You, the first man in the world—she, the first woman God made;
Love is your birthright—your prize—hid in the heart of the glade.

Dusk wraps the swamp coolibars,
Out on the reedy lagoon, Grows the white reflex of stars,
And the gold disc of the moon;
There, where a bandicoot drinks, Ripples grow wide from the bank, Orange the homestead light blinks, Under the brown ridge's flank.
Ah! All that was—and is not—
Will my heart never grow wise?
Just for a space I forgot This was a song of blue skies.

THE TELEGRAM.

Across the desolation of waste and silent land, Above a narrow bridle track grooved in the clogging sand,
And into ridgy country, where stunted grass-trees grow,
And by the shallow-bedded creeks, where muddy waters flow,
It flies, to move the stoutest heart, to sorrow or for weal,
The message of the written thought, along the wires of steel.
In hottest night it speeds between the clearings in the scrub, Along the main road, where the lights are flaring in the pub, Over the scented timber flats, by Candle-nut in bloom, Where wallaby flit silently, grey shadows in the gloom.

Or, climbing high the crested hill, it moves along the line, Where bush fires swept the grassy slope about the blackened pine,
And where the bark-walled farmhouse lies, and where the sorghum grows, And where the wash-pool drafts out sheep as white as mountain snows,

Until by plains of waving grass, and bush roads hard and brown,
The message of the wired thought has reached the humming town.
It clicks and clatters to the ears of an impatient clerk,
It leaves upon the running tape the import of its mark,
And once again the pregnant words, on paper gathered down,
The message of the written thought goes out into the town.

In uniform of blue and red, the youngster rides the street,
By the smart car and shabby 'bus, he hurries sure and fleet, Till, where dark palms across the road their slender shadows cast,
The message of the wired thought has found its goal at last.
The hand that grasps it hesitates, the heart that waited fears,
A moment—ere the die is flung for laughter or for tears—
The loved one grasps at life again, and all the dread is o'er,
The dear one who went far afield will touch our lip no more—So, each day, through the drowsy air, the word that binds or parts Is flashed across the wind-swept bush to heal or break our hearts.

FEVER.

“A whirlwind o’er the sun-cracked plain blows, at the tent flap tearing, Why! Ellen’s standing at the door, is that a shroud she’s wearing?
No! it’s the white dress that she wore the night we two were parted, But she is smiling now at me, no longer broken hearted!
She fades away—without a word of pity for my pain, . . .
And the hot fever surges come and sweep along my brain.
If I could reach some quiet spot. . . where never sun is found,
A cool and silent earth lapped place, some six feet under ground,
I would lie down and sleep at last, with only earth about me,
With no red devils in my brain, and no white girl to flout me! . . .
Why. . . is that water that I hear, a-ripple in the willows?
I lie in my old bed at home, with fresh sweet linen pillows . . .
And hear the heron near the dyke, go fishing in the sedges, While slow foot cattle come to drink along the river edges!

There! there! a dream! oh! curse the change I find when I've been dreaming!

Away, beyond the timber line, the cockatoos are screaming,

The water-bag hangs by the door to catch what breeze is going. . .

Good God! I'm in the Park at home . . . and heavens! how it's snowing!

I thought I was stretched in a tent, a canvas bunk my bed."

And so the broken pearls of thought run down a ravelled thread,

"How white the snow, it hurts my eyes, and are those church bells ringing?

I find the church door, enter in, and . . . that is Ellen singing!

Demure she smiles across the pews . . . her brown eyes on me turning,

I want her cold hands on my head, for they might ease its burning. . .

What! back again, grey canvas walls? I thought that I was dreaming,

The glimpse of gum trees thro' the door are far too real for seeming.

The flies crawl up and down the pole, across the earthen floor,

A line of straggling sugar-ants zig-zag towards the door . . .

A red sun beats on tent and fly, the fever shapes dance round,

I wish I had a cool dark spot, some six feet underground!"

THE LONELY WOMAN.

Where the iron barks are hanging leaves disconsolate and pale,

Where the wild vines o'er the ranges their spilt cream of blossom trail,

By the door of the bark humpey, by the rotting bloodwood gates,

On the river bound selection, there a lonely woman waits.

Waits and watches gilded sunrise glow behind the mountain peak,

Hears the water hens' shrill piping, in the rushes by the creek,

And by sullen stormy sunsets, when the anxious cattle call,

Sees the everlasting gum trees closing round her like a wall.

With the hunger of her bosom notes the wild birds seek their mates,

All alone and heavy hearted, there the lonely woman waits.

Where the tall, brown city buildings, loom against a cloud-flecked sky,

Where along the curving tramlines brightly varnished cars rush by,

Where the call of petty traders echoes down the dusty street,

And forever comes the beating of the many passing feet, Where the bamboo reeds are whispering by the green park's iron gates, By the muslin curtained window, there a lonely woman waits.

Where the white caps lash the sea-wall, and the great waves thunder by,
Where the grey rains sweep the beaches underneath a sodden sky, Where the swift winged gull flies landward, and the fisher bides at home, When the long Pacific reaches are a seething stretch of foam, Where the empty boat drifts seawards, by the ocean's sand-flanked gates, In the weather-boarded cottage, there a lonely woman waits.

Where the river boats are calling, where the railway engine shrieks, Or where only wild bird liltings echo from the reedy creeks, Where the grey waves grieve to landward, and a wet wind beats the seas, Or where pearl-white moths flit slowly through the dropping wattle trees, By the high verandah pillars, by the rotting blood-wood gates, Crowded town or dreary seaboard, everywhere some woman waits!

THE OTHER SIDE.

"I am busy sorting the morning's post," Jonathan puts down his cup to say,
"They're hanging a man at the jail to-day,"
And he helps himself to the buttered toast.

Thro' the lattice window there comes the call,
Of sparrows chirping along the rail,
A great Magnolia blossom pale, Spreads its drowsy sweetness over all.

The grasses are long on the patch of lawn, Wild bees cling close to the hearts of flowers,
A promise of warmer noon tide hours,
On the scented breeze from the north is borne.

And the children laugh with no sound of strife,
As they pass to school on their loitering way,
And every pulse of the summer's day,
Is a throb with the lusty force of life.

A dimpled daring, mischievous elf,
One arm encircling his book and slate,
Makes a snatch at a rosebud through the gate
And the clock strikes eight on the mantel shelf.

With no mourning train, and no church bell's toll,
Where the prison walls rise rough and brown,
The other side of the sunlit town,
They are setting a-drift a human soul.

Now Jonathan pushes the window wide,
I pin in his coat a late blown rose,
And out of the shady room he goes,
To the amber glare of the world outside.

I cannot help thinking, the while I note,
The flowers that bloom and the birds that sing,
Of that horrible, quiv'ring human thing,
And the cowering soul on the winds afloat.

The tendrilled wealth of a vine astray,
To the clasp of the lattice frame is caught,
I wish I could banish that haunting thought,
"They're hanging a man at the jail to-day!"

FETTERED.

Elma chides because she says,
That my love has faded,
And her bodice heaves with sighs,
And she sadly pouts and cries, Looks on me with tear dimmed eyes,
By long lashes shaded.

Thinks that if she threatens thus I will grow the fonder,
Of the lips that call for kisses, Arms that offer all the blisses, (What a wealth of true love this is,
For a man to squander!)

Elma vows I am forsworn, Fondling her no longer, Sweetheart, if you only knew,
More than half your word's are true,
For I do not think of you,
Other loves are stronger.

But t'is not for other faces,
That my love grows colder,
I am false for far grey skies,
Where blue peaks of mountains rise,
And forget the girl who lies Warm against my shoulder.

I forget her in the dreaming Of a man's life only,
Where no woman hands are clinging,
And no syren voices singing, Hoofs upon a hard road ringing,
And a bush track lonely!

Clear horizons dipped in morning, Mists about the valley, Strike the tent! and up! away!
In the warm, delicious day, Men together strong and gay, Tracking through the mallee.

There's the rival if you will,
Girl so full of scorning;
Not another woman's gaze, Wandering in forbidden ways,
Just the dear lost boyish days,
Of my life's lost morning!

ON THE PIER.

Far out, where a path of silver leads over the tumbling sea,
In the sweep of the murm'ring waters, a fish leaps suddenly,
And the wind comes out of the distance, from the heart of the night,
And along the shore where the high road runs, there hovers a moving light.
A swinging lamp on the jetty, a moving light on the shore,
And sobbing against the red cliff the stir of the ocean's roar, While over the boom of the surges, pathetic, and faint and thin,
There wails from the town the fretting of a grieving violin.

Black at the jetty entrance, where the white sand meets the seas, Bulky sentinels of the shore loom up the cotton wood trees.
On the crest of the esplanade, the curve of the Lovers' Walk,
A flowering aloe leans far back, wind bent on its slender stalk.
A ragged line of iron barks, a Moreton fig tree high, Shut out the houses of the town, and a patch of star-flecked sky,

And a lonely bunya spreads its arms, as though it mourned to know, That far off on the mist blue mountains, its sundered brethren grow.

Wash of the whispering waters round the great sea rotting piles, Breezes wandering round us, that have followed the salt wet miles,
The little mean thoughts have left us, the gossip and strife and pain,
Of shut in cities, seems as though it never could hurt again;
Not from the voice of the chapel, pent in by the busy marts, Does the message of Love eternal steal to our jaded hearts;
Not in the heated churches, bending low on our board-cramped knees, But in the boom of the surges, and truths of the wise old seas!

I REMEMBER.

I sit by the fire, for the nights are cold,
And the winter's hard when you're growing old,

Ah!.....I remember,

A creek that rippled the whole day long And sang to the Dogwoods a mystic song,
The sparse leaved gum, with its flowering crest,
And the tunnelled banks where the sand tits nest,
And a wide warm stretch of sun-kissed sward, Where pebbles glint in the shallow ford,

Ah!.....I remember,

What it was to be young, and glad, and strong,
By a creek that rippled the whole day long!

I heap more wood on the smouldering fire,
That burns like Age with its weak desire.

Ah!.....I remember,

The muster of cattle away Out Back,
The thunder of hoofs, and the stockwhip's crack,
The panting breaths on the warm sweet breeze,
The tossing horns by Rosella trees,
And the whirl of dust, and the hot hide's reek, When that red bull cornered me by the creek!

Ah!.....I remember,

What a muscle I had for a stockwhip's crack,
In the rollicking mustering days Out Back!

The wind blows chill from the range to-day, Blows chill from those blue peaks miles away.....

Ah!.....I remember,
The shiv'ring sheep in the deep wash pool,
The sunlight bleaching the scoured wool (That was white and pure as a boy's first years), And the ewes, just fresh from the ringer's shears,
Or patched here and there with the tar pot's shine, Where some novice's blade had clipped too fine!

Ah!.....I remember,
The long, low shed, and the bales of wool,
And the huddled sheep by the wide wash pool!

Now I crouch by the fire, the days are cold,
And the nights are long, when you're growing old!

Ah!.....I remember,
How I reined my horse by the rough slip rail,
When a waning moon o'er the ridge rose pale,
And in the hush of the scrub's still gloom,
I saw the stars of clematis bloom;
While from the dusk of the lightwood tree,
Out of the shadows she came to me....

Ah!.....I remember,
And shall recall, till my senses fail,
How I held her close, by the rough slip-rail!

READY MADES.

All day she works at the sewing machine, in the factory opposite, Where the staring blindless windows gape in the glow of the summer light, And all day long comes the clang and whirr, from the dusty, sun-flecked room, Looking on to a narrow city lane, where the tall black chimneys loom;
Her pale face bending above her work, thin hands on the fabric laid, From morning bell to the closing bell, she toils at the "ready made."
A sparrow hopping athwart the sill, glances in at the long bare room,
And it brings a breath from the city parks, where the jacarandas bloom; Up from the street, on the other side, comes the lilt of a passing band, But her eyes are fixed on the level seams that slide from beneath her hand.
In the drag of the sultry days she works her treadmill from morn to night, Behind the blindless window panes, in the factory opposite.
And what does she think of? Sitting there, hour by hour, in the beat and whirr, Ah! What are the thoughts of happier days that rise up and laugh with her?

She sees the line of the pale blue hills, and the river like sheeted grass, Hears the cattle tramp to the branding yards, all over the tussac grass, And she sees the hare bells about the plain, and the windmill on the rise, The long green sweep of the tasselled corn, that is grateful to aching eyes; She sees the sheep in the wool-shed pens, and the myalls along the ridge,
And she hears the swish of the brown flood tides race under the swinging bridge; And she sees the gate by the ruined yard, where young love and laughter met, While the night wind scattered the honey sweets of the unseen mignonette;
She sees the jasmine's petalled stars, and the buds of the ti-tree flower, And she rocks afloat in the cedar boat, for one still delicious hour;
She sees the skies that are far and clear as the eyes of a dreamer's dream, All the while that her prodding needle pricks on over the hard white seam;
And the thoughts of days that are dead for aye, rise up and laugh with her, As she works the treadle at "ready made," in the thunder and the whirr!

THE LAND OF THE SUN.

This is the land of the Sun! in the cool of green seas God laid it;

He was glad when He planned its beauty, out of His joy He made it;

Kind smiles for the wooded valleys, and the stir of the park set towns,

And the plains where the warm wind ripples the wheat on the black soil downs;

And an echo of joy for the mountains, fringed high with the bunya pines,

And the hidden laugh of the gold reef, that lurks in the shafted mines.

This is the land of the Sun! Where the buzzard stalks thro' the grasses,

And the plover hide in the tussocks, when the brown-faced drover passes.

Where the palest blue of the bluebell faints, under a tropic sky,

And the desert pea burns scarlet, on the sand hills hot and dry,

And far in the dark scrub thickets, at the back of the squatter's run,

The cool green of the leafy roof tent is flecked by the golden sun.

She was a child of the sun; it gave to her cheeks their roses,

Dropped crimson about her lips, as the brush of a god disposes;

And dappled her brow with its kisses, flashed lights in her hazel eyes,

Such as made the angels' lanterns, in the Gardens of Paradise.

Straight was her form and slender, and her hair was a gilded glory,

Her life was a ray of sunshine, entwined with a love god's story.

Was'there time when I did not love her? Only before I knew her!

The very wild vines in the scrub were straining their tendrils to her!

Was I more blind than the flowers? Was I dazzled with too much sun?

Not 'I! We met in the drowsy noon, and loved ere the day was done!

Did I tell her I loved her? Did her beauty silence my tongue?

Both of us twain had eyes to speak, and, dear God;
we were both so young!

I tethered my horse to the rail, I found the path by the ridges,

While sunset's roses in the sky, were wreathing the frail cloud bridges;

And she, while the gloaming shadows fell low down in the wooded west,

She fled like a shy sweet forest thing, to the shelter of my breast!

She was a child of the sun—and her light went out in the darkness, Death stepped down from the hillside, where he lurks in his bone white starkness; He clutched at my garnered sunshine—he covered its fire with mould, To think that the fires of those eyes could ever grow black and cold!
I fought for her life like a savage. . . I thought that my arms were stronger, I look at my hands with hate to-day. . . they fend for her no longer!
And she was a child of the sun—and she lies for aye in the shade. . . .
Lies where a tangle of hoya climbs, and where bower birds once played; Lies where the river ripples low, as it slips to the billabong,
And her eyes are blind to the sunlight—her ears are deaf to the song. .

This is the land of the Sun! Of lagoons where the reed beds shiver, Where at night the eyes of the stars see their dazzling reflex quiver, Where the grey-winged brolga treads the dance, and the water-hen calls shrill, And the springing mobs of kangaroos, feed down by the wattled hill.
This is the land of the Sun! It was writ that they should not sever, Child of the sun in a sunny land, wrapped in its clasp forever,

Death lapped her close in the sun-baked earth, God set wild blooms above her,
The voice of the mighty island said, "She is mine own; I love her."

Ah! Great is the power of Death! And this is the land of the Sun, It blazes on plain and timber, till the gold of the day is done;
It scorches the wide grassed paddocks, and it flames on the dusty track, But warmth to her heart, light to her eyes, no might of its fire brings back!

THE NATIVE-BORN.

I looked at him and I laughed. "What have you to offer," I said,—

"The moonlight-marvel of silver—or the glint of gold that is red,

The priceless dazzle of diamonds, silks of a delicate hue,

—Empty-hand and Lack-o'Land—is it thus that you go to woo?"

The brown of his eyes was dauntless; the tan of his cheek paled not,

"Love has grown grave in the Castle that smiled in the reed-thatched cot,

And you say I have naught to offer, I, who am Native-Born,

Heir to silver of countless stars, and the rustless gold of morn;

I, who have watched from the mountain, the hosts of the Lord grow dim,

And seen day flush o'er the rivers where the monster saurians swim;

I, who have dusted the pollen of wattle sweets from my arm,

And drunk the milk of the cocoanut I wrenched from the swaying palm;

I, who rippled the crystal creek in joy of the morning dip,

Brushed the honey of native bees away from my bearded lip;

I, who have couched on the close green turf, walled in by the blackbutt trees, Trode a carpet of cotton-grass that swept to my dew-damp knees;

I, who have gathered diamonds that lurk in the buttercup,

Snatched a pearl from a daisy's heart, where wand'ring brown moths sup;

I, who ride by the bridle track, with no man to say me 'nay,'

To the rim of the mist-blue world, at shut of a burning day;

I, who can dream in the moss-hung scrub, sing to the tall bethars,

Gaze my fill at the Southern Cross, built high in an arch of stars!

I was born on the black-soil Downs, and rocked by the Southern breeze,

The kingdom I have to offer is wide to Pacific seas!
And the big grey spider hanging from a branch of the swinging pine,

Spins silk that were finest decking for a true sweetheart of mine!

Let her take my hand and follow! The road to the Northward runs.

She shall have silver of moonlight—gold of Australian suns!

Was it Lack-o'-Land ye would call me? I, who am Native-Born,

Have heard the twittering parrakeets in stalks of the greening corn;

Have plucked the buds from the lucerne; pulled grapes from the laden vine,

Empty-of-hand and Lack-o'-Land! Why, the whole wide earth is mine!"

I looked at him and I laughed. "But a maid asks more than this!

You think the key to magic doors is hid in a bridal kiss!

Trees would be only trees to her—she would crave a carven roof,

The clashing of a city band for beat of the chestnut's hoof."

The fire in his eyes died not; the smile on his mouth lurked yet.

"Oh! Greybeard, in a heart grown cold, it is easy to forget!

Man calls, a woman follows (an' she love him) by ridge and dell,

To the creak of the saddle leather—the lilt of a horse's bell.

An' she care not the lighter does the chestnut hack go forth,

For plains of the purple vinca, the green of the sea-washed North.

But Life of Life! An' she love me our skies will be always blue,

And then I have much to offer, Greybeard, as I go to woo!"

I saw him cross the ranges, from shadow into the shine,

And back came his gay voice floating: "The whole of the world is mine!"

THE WASTED DAY.

I have wasted a day!
In the gleam and the glint of bauhinia trees,
I have sat very still with a book on my knees, While a flicker of leaves chased the sun o'er the page,
I have felt like a bird, just escaped from the cage.
I have revelled in silence, or whisper of wind, Till the cobwebs were swept from each nook in my mind,
And the lives and the souls of the things of the wild,
Are as real to me now—as when I was a child!

I have wasted a day!
There was dew on the grass as I climbed by the rise,
It was hiding the gold of the buttercups' eyes;
And dew-sodden, the spider web drooped from the bough, Tho' it swings taut and fine in the sun's splendour now;
And the little roan calf, by the billabong's bank, Stared his wonder at me, past his mother's broad flank;
And, where the wide flats by the tide were left free,
A fish-hawk swept scarlet of wings to the sea!

I have wasted a day!

But the hills were veiled lightly in gossamer cloud,
And I knew where the waterfall, clamouring loud, Spills squander of diamonds by wet rock and fern,
And the vales that are dimpled, and cliffs that are stern;

And I knew where, by bracken and stiff crested palm,

By the steel-girded bridge, and the semaphore's arm,

Through the jar of the cutting, across the hill's breast,

The black engine beat out, on its way to the west.

I have wasted a day!

I have dipped in my book; read a page here and there;

Then watched the hawk hang, level-winged, in the air.

I have re-read a portion, thought over a phrase, Too happy to censure—too idle to praise;

I have seen a moth glimmer in eddying flight, While I wondered at men, and the books that they write,

Deciding how tedious the printed page looks, Since Nature has written such marvellous books!

I have wasted a day!

For at noon came the boom of the in-washing tide,
I could see the pale silver, encroaching and wide;
I could hear the salt breeze flutter grass-spear and leaf,

And I knew that, far out, on the edge of the reef,

Where the brown seaweeds cling, and the green waters comb,
All the long coral ridges were sheeted with foam, That creams round the spars and the spoil of the wreck, Where the cobra-worm bores in the drift of the deck.

I have wasted a day!

At night the wind dropped in aisles tree flanked and green,

And along the blue heavens and amethyst sheen Streaked the paling impress of the path of the sun,
And the tall peaks grew purple, then faded to dun;
And where crimson cloud-wisps watched the golden day die,

On a sudden the colour was filched from the sky, And the mourners came up from the bier of the day—

Strange, shadowy figures, in habits of grey!

I have wasted a day!

But I laughed my defiance aloud to a star Hanging high in the place where the hopes of men are;

And when crickets a-chirp to the rising moon sang (A slim silver thing, like a god's boomerang), I swept careless feet o'er the grass-matted soil,
As I cried "Fellow men! Are ye wise in your toil?
For I have found treasure ye cannot assay—Look deep in my heart—Have I wasted my day?"

THE LOCKED DOOR.

You are my friend—your hand is on the door
That shuts out other love forevermore!

Did you not once, just when my eyes held yours, Give me a glimpse of unforgotten shores?
Seas warm and still, of lapis lazuli,
Of sunspears flashing thro' a brilliant sky—
And strange pale petalled blooms that held a scent
To drug to ecstasies of great content.

You are my friend—your hand has turned the key Of the Great Gate of Love That Must Not Be!

Yet once—the gate you bar so close swung wide,
I saw the gloaming aisles that lie inside, Heard the strange rustling of the Tree Of Fate, Whose tasselled boughs tap on that iron gate;
And all the voices that have ever sung Their love in that soft universal tongue;
And all the sighs of hearts that cast the die, Reckless repeating, Naught—but you and I,” Ev'ry low love-croon, each cry of sorrow
From souls whose day has not a to-morrow—
And thro' it all the harp that makes men mad, Kept thrumming, “This—and this—you might have had!”

You are my friend—this path you offer me,
'Twixt box-hedges, many a trim-kept tree;
Bare, open glades, and grassy lawns set wide,
To a long sweep of beach and lapping tide, .
Where many walk, and, as we pass, we greet
The same grave shadow in all eyes we meet.— Straight, open—grey—the road runs to the end—
This is the way you mark for me, oh! Friend!
The Open Road—unsheltered—storm or shine—Never love-lips for me, nor hand on mine!

Did Nature, when she tossed her shuttlecock, Shaping my life, evolve it but to mock?
What has her tricking, wanton, fancy proved?
I wanted so to love, and to be loved!
The river that is pent within my heart,
Along whose banks the buds of passion start; Whose force, thro' silent nights, has grown and grown,
Would sweep between its banks for you alone!
There is no channel for the river now,
No ears to listen if I plead or vow—Oh, hidden garden, and, oh, dreamful sea,
And stretch of level road you offer me!

You are my friend—but I remember yet—Scent of wild rose and drowsing violet,— Glades where the secret harp goes murmuring, And fine green leaves from earth to heaven swing.

So dear, farewell,—For I go evermore, Rememb'ring what lies hid behind the door!

PEACE AND WAR.

An old world garden, full of tangled sweets,
And drowsy with its heavy perfumed air, Green boughs o'er hanging moss grown garden seats,
Tall hollyhocks—and roses everywhere!

A white moth hovers o'er a pansy bed, Pale lilies nod upon their slender stalks;
Beyond, the flame tree flaunts its flag of red,
And silence broods along the empty walks.

Now a soft breeze across the pleasance comes,
The jacaranda blossoms drift and fall....
And hark! From out the East a roll of drums,
And from the West an answ'ring bugle call!

THE OUTLAW.

In the watches of the night I hear his hoof beats pass, Clear upon the flinty road, and muffled on the grass,
I twist the silken coverlet, I turn upon my bed, While he is riding nightly with a price upon his head!

A year ago last Michaelmas, as I came slowly home, Where in the shadow of the lane the wanton fire-flies roam,
And a great harvest moon at full, was red behind the trees,
I heard the saddle leather creak beneath his close pressed knees.

I scarce knew how it happened, for we did not pause or speak,
He caught me to the saddle bow, and kissed me on the cheek.
Upon the summit of the hill, the cruel chains are swung,
And there, this Spring, a cut-purse, and an outlawed noble hung;

I know he, too, will ride someday, his last ride on the hill,
And I shall never speak one word, tho' silent grief may kill.
My father toasts King George's health, and damns his enemies,
And I pray for an outlaw's life, upon my bended knees!

The young bloods boast if they caress my haughty finger tips,
And yet—my cheek has pressed so close 'gainst those forbidden lips,
If they knew that—how they would jest, and sneer across the wine,
And vow the favours of their queans were no more free than mine!

If they but knew! But they do not—and so I mince and smile,
And scorn them as I scorn myself, a mummer all the while!
The only time that I am free, with mask and smile put by,
Is when I hear those hoof beats ring beneath a star-gemmed sky.

Ah! me! To think I lie so soft, secure within my bed, While he rides by—an outlaw—with a price upon his head!

AN OLD WOMAN.

I see her pass
In a faded skirt that once was bright,
In a dingy blouse that once was white,
And the wealth of hair
That women envied, and men called fair,
 Poor locks, alas!
They still keep a hint of their youthful gold, Screwed back from the face so worn and old,
They crinkle still in the same crisp way,
As when lover's fingers were wont to play Tenderly with their golden gleam.
And I wish that I still could hope and dream
 As I see her pass.

In her battered hat and her shabby shoes—
What man ever thinks as he pleads and woos—
Of the after wreck?
He sees the curve of the warm white neck,
 But no magic glass
Shows him the face with its beauty gone,
The naked soul that must stand alone, Robbed of the fire of love and youth,
Just a wan grey mask of decay and truth;
No glamour of folly, or gloss of lies,
Can speak of beauty to those poor eyes,
 As I see her pass.

As I see her pass
I grieve for the things that the years must see,
For lost ideals and reality;
For the thin grey hair
That women envied and men called fair.

Poor locks, alas!
You were praised so much for your glorious sheen,
A crown for the head of a very Queen.
Men brought gay flowers and jewels to deck
That firm white bosom, that soft white neck—Ah! fret of moth, and ah! rust of gold—I turn away from a tale re-told,
As I see her pass.

THE GIRL IN YELLOW.

The girl in yellow on the stage,
Smiles, twists, and turns, and pirouettes,
I wonder if she sees me here,
And thinks, "How quickly he forgets!"
For I, who sit by Marcia's side, Must smile as she does act a part;
I, who long since, have held so close
The girl in yellow to my heart.

On her white brow a wreath is set,
And down her arms a garland falls,
'Twere wiser if I turned my gaze
To jewelled Marcia in the stalls.
Oh! Marcia, in my book of life,
What know you of the hidden page?
I wish I could forget her eyes,
The girl in yellow on the stage.

The music hurries, faster yet,
And then a sudden breathless pause;
I wonder if they heard me groan, Amid the thunder of applause.
The curtain falls, and Marcia speaks,
"This piece," she says, "is all the rage!"
I bow my head. I only saw A girl in yellow on the stage.

THE DEAD SLAVE.

"I will be glad—bring me the festal cloak,
The beaten chain—and thrust pale Sorrow by!
There are a hundred maids more fair in Rome, Strangle lean Grief, and bid full Pleasure come,
I will be glad—bring me the festal cloak,
And—(Mighty Slayer! She was young to die!)

I will be glad—so bind the sandal straight,
Not pearls—but jewels all opposed to tears,
And priceless perfumes, dropping spicy-sweet,
That make me think of dancing naked feet—
The lonely lion seeks another mate, Her grave is deep—(And yet, I feel she hears—)

I want that black browed girl to bring the bowl,
The girl whose lips are like pomegranite flow'rs,
Her amber flesh would make a god forget,
Life is too brief to weep and waste and fret;
The pulsing bosom—never mind the soul!
Kisses for me (for her the long cold hours—).

Oh, little body nestled on my heart,
Oh, purchased slave, who yet was all my Queen,
The purity my passions could not slay,
The silent, clasping night, the dreaming day.
Oh! Death! draw out your arrows from her heart, And give me back the love that once has been!"

PEGGY'S EYES.

Would you see the lakes of Scotland, the braw lakes of Scotland, Deep and blue and wonderful as drowned blue skies,
Where heather-footed mountains smile?
Then come with me and gaze awhile
In Peggy's eyes.

And would you see the kind heart, the fond heart, and the leal heart;
Where betwixt dark lashes the captured sunshine lies,
Where roses riot in her face?
Then come with me and gaze a space In Peggy's eyes.

CHAPERONES.

With chilly feet and aching eyes, sitting against the wall,
Watching the budding beauties pass in triumph thro' the ball, Watching the swirl of silken skirts, hearing the music moan, Thinking of days when never feet were lighter than our own;
Thinking of eyes that looked in ours, eager for smile or word;
Thinking of tones of easy praise—half of a life unheard!
All the little a woman loves—all that she finds so much—
All the gossamer joys of youth—fled at the lean years' touch.
Grey-haired women, with wrinkled cheeks, have we forgotten all,
Do you think that we never dream—sitting against the wall?

Spectacled and over stout, heavy-cheeked, or thin and worn,
We are the twilight colourless; they are the rose-red morn;
Twilight muffles the reckless leap of quiv'ring young-old hearts,

As with drawn lips and mein severe, we play our thankless parts!

We have our scars—they throb and burn just as they used to do,

At the stir of a silken skirt—brush of a satin shoe.
Oh! sobbing music—that laughs for them, oh! wind in the oaks outside,

We have been winsome maid and wife, and we have been shrinking bride;

Death's is the one dance undanced, for us, who have footed all,

The last quadrille for veterans, sitting against the wall!

Peering thro' the painted net, and ivory of a fan,
The dim old eyes are clear once more, and the lips desired of man,

In the hush of velvet nights, 'neath the coronal of stars,

We hear the breeze go whimpering out by the black belars—

We are so old—so long unloved—shall we grow never wise,

As we droop our heads, remembering the magic of those skies?—

And then back to the lighted room, the sweet, last waltz begins,

The 'cello, with a waking sob, throbs thro' the violins.

To us it sings—as young love sang—a tender, deathless croon,

To the swing of swishing skirts, and the tap of pointed shoon!

Oh, dimpled maids, who play to-night, your merry mad-cap parts,
You, too, some day, with reckless leap of quiv'ring
young-old hearts,
With wearied and remembering eyes, will sit against the wall,
And watch the budding beauties pass in triumph thro' the ball!

THE SAGE.

We talked of science in a lighted room,
While outside there was rain and wind and gloom,
You spoke of fluent tongue with many things, Showed me the earnestness which learning brings,
Modest, and yet excelling everywhere, While I mused, "Have soft fingers through his hair Ever passed lovingly, and in their play Trembled a little on that hint of grey?"
Great was my privilege, in gracious mood,
You saw in me a mind that understood.
Only a mind! The rest was but a part;
A sort of make weight! Body, hands, and heart!
Favored, was I, indeed! And welcome there While you spoke on, to be the listener,
We talked of science in a lighted room,
While outside there was wind and rain and gloom.
You talked, I listened, wondering the while,
Had some rare woman ever made you smile, Forgetting wisdom for a little space,
To be just a fond man and kiss her face!

THE LIGHTED ROOM.

Do you know the joy of a lighted room, with a laughing face to greet you?

The pleasant word, the tender look, and the open arms to meet you?

When the firelight flickers on the blind, and the outside world is hid,

You've a casket full of secret sweets, and you've but to raise the lid.

For there the cosy rose of love blooms with un-fading bloom,

Lucky indeed is he who goes home to a lighted room.

Do you know the grief of an empty room, where ghosts of dead love are lying,

When the winds steal through the open door, with the sobs of the great world's sighing?

The blackened grate, and the undrawn blind, and the cheerless walls about you,

With never a woman's voice to say, "Oh! the day was long without you!"

Ah! sad is he, with no beacon light, in a night of starless gloom,

Who, with slow step and a tired heart, goes home to an empty room!

THE CIRCUS LION.

The spoil of cunning human hands,
The tawny lion lies, Dreaming, perchance, of desert sands,
And far-off Lybian skies.

He sees the tombs of kings rise dark,
The moonlight on the plain,
While a pale, narrow-shouldered clerk, Makes comments on his mane.

He rises, snarling at the hands,
That point their feeble fun,
And longs upon the midnight sands,
To see the red blood run.

He beats the rough boards with his tail,
His great jaws gnash their rage,
But what can royal strength avail, Against a bar-set cage?

His muscles strain, his eyes grow dark,
He crouches for a spring. . . .
Secure, the flaccid, weakling clerk, Laughs at the Captive King!

THE NEW FENCE.

They are pulling down the old brown fence; they started work to-day, There's going to be a brand new fence built up across the way.
Rough hands are tearing down the wealth of twisted eglantine,
And scattering the roses' hearts—as torn and bruised as mine.
The old brown fence was sunken, and it sagged out here and there,
But all about its rotting posts grew clumps of maidenhair;
A curtain of green creepers hung across it to the road—
No wonder that the old fence bowed itself beneath the load.

And now the garden lies outspread, like some poor heart laid bare,
For vulgar hands to pick and pry, and vulgar eyes to stare;
And here it was, on one fair night, that crowns my memory,
She leaned her white arms on the fence, and looked across at me;
And I read laughter on her lip, and question in her eye;
I leapt across to answer her, the fence was not too high.

But when they build the new white fence, conventional and prim,
It will be no meet resting place for arms so fair and slim;
Alone she will watch roses bud, and violets droop and die.
I shall be in the dusty road. The fence will be too high.

A STILL NIGHT.

Here lurk the shadows of the windless street,
Here is a wide set window lamplight red,
Here comes the drag of slow unhurried feet,
By railed-in gardens where the breeze is dead,
Where dusty buds unfurl the flag of Spring, Burns a pale gas-flame straight, unflickering.

The leaf that has survived to be the mock
..Of baby green (the pledge of summer's love), Drops, where at dawn the chirping sparrows flock
To gossip in the thick banana grove;
But even that, so close the spell is laid,
Scarce any rustle in its downfall made.

A sweep of sky with white unwavering stars,
A chequered street, half shadow and half light,
And where the red lamp throws its slanting bars, Across the still enchantment of the night,
Like haunting pixie music, sweet and thin,
There steals the tinkle of a mandolin.

THE PANTHEIST.

Through painted windows here and there, the summer sun steals in,
And, as I kneel in prayer, I hear that I was born in sin, Here lies a regal purple patch, here spills a splash of red,
There wavering prisms softly catch the preacher's ill-thatched head.
And, over all the droning voice, which bids us look for pain,
The chirping sparrows cry, "Rejoice! for Spring is here again!"

Outside the parks are putting on an over dress of green;
The sloping hills their grandeur don, gem set with flowers between;
The sap is rising in the trees, the seedling in the sod,
And, though upon my knees, I cry, "This God is not my God!"
For mine is not a God of Wrath; He lives in bush and tree;
He bids the snow-white May break forth, to cheer and comfort me.
He reaches down a helping hand: He says, "Look round—and live!"
Enough, a man to understand; enough, God to forgive!

A great and lofty church is this, the vault is arched o'erhead;
The reading desk and eagle is with shining wings outspread;
And from the Holy Book there falls a ribbon worked with gold, White tablets gleam along the walls, black lettered, chaste and cold!
When I shall die no marble square shall mark the wall for me, My body shall make blossoms fair, and help the growing tree.
Where somewhere on the earth I lie, shall spring up jasmine bowers,
And the free soul, which once was I, shall riot in the flowers!

CREEKS OUT WEST.

The creeks in Western Queensland are, to all appearances, nothing but dry sand beds; but under the sand, available by sinking a shaft a foot or two, good water is to be found. Even in the time of the great drought the supply in many of these creeks neither failed nor diminished. The foliage of the gum trees along the banks is noticeably fuller and greener than that of their fellows further back in the paddocks, but there is nothing on the surface of the sand-wastes to show to the inexperienced eye the water flowing underneath.

Far underneath the heat-white sand the hidden waters lie,

When, in the spring, the gum boughs wave their blossoms to the sky;

Slip the cool green of silent tides along the creeks Out Back.

The hot winds crackle in the grass, the drought-breath burns the weeds,

No clear blue waves go lapping to the rhythm of the reeds,

But striking through the heavy sand a water-gaining quest,

The bushman fills his billy from the hidden stream Out West.

At dawn beside the water-course the magpie trills his song,

The brown snake stirs the grasses that the stock left dry and long,
The slow guana waddles from his carrion-feast at noon,
And 'possums play in iron-barks beneath a pale gold moon,
And through the dusk towards the camp the lank brown drover rides,
And wonders at the secrets of those slipping, voiceless tides,
The beef-wood scatters creamy blooms along the singing breeze,
The heavy cattle chew the cud between the brig-low trees,
And when the stars like shattered gems flash all about the sky, Far underneath the dew-damp sand the hidden waters lie.

ESTELLE.

"And diamonds," said the lover; then Estelle saw them glimmer,
And a robe of heavy satin beneath their star-white shimmer,
With the little blue lights flickering, as the ice-sheen on the hill, Where the sharp peaks rise to Heaven, and the snow packs, soft and still.

"Rare diamonds," said the lover; she saw them in dark tresses, Sparkling on fair, idle fingers, like to fairy-frost on dresses, Heaped tiaras, curving necklets, bands on wrists too slender for them, Regal stones on Queenly bosoms, rainbow-flashing, Estelle saw them.

But her slippered foot ceased tapping on the light-reflecting floor,
And her long dark eyes grew dreamy—was it gems that Estelle saw?

There is a spot to Southward, where granite ranges slumber, Grey fern-footed tors and daisies, bee-orchids without number,

Shaded gullies, where the moss lies, and the mountain runlets tinkle,
And the sodden logs sink blackly where the gushing waters sprinkle, There's a place ringed in by gum trees, where the sun breaks thro' at noon, Where eyeless fish in hidden holes hear hidden waters croon, Where only, in the drowsy hours, the creak of boughs is heard,
And seldom comes an answering note to challenge of a bird . . .
There is a scent of growing things by scattered rock and tor, Perhaps the dream in Estelle's eyes sought haven there once more. . .

"And much travel," said the lover. Then Estelle saw the ocean,
And the white deck of a steamer, the blue, the light and motion;
And the high waves lifting, lifting, and the islands decked with green, The crumbling ancient buildings set, the straight stemmed palms between,
Saw the hill-bound pathways rising, the temples and the flowers,
And the sand-flats of the desert, and the full, enriching hours,
"And great cities," said the lover; Estelle saw the humming town,
And the thirst for wider knowledge deepened in her eyes of brown.

Then close her ivory fingers clasped on her round, woman-knee,
The eager light died in her eyes—what else did Estelle see?

There's a grassy plain to Westward, where the wire fences spread,
A heat-wave dancing to the sky, a blue glare overhead;
A dry creek bed that waits the flood, and a rambling throng of trees, A honey crown of Bloodwood flow'r, the thick dull hum of bees;
A dusty lane, a station roof, by a lane where shadows creep,
And far away, the long complaint from mobs of travelling sheep;
A willow dipping to a pool, where white feathered Ibis drink, Spurs dragging on the pebbled walk—Oh! Estelle must not think!
A cedar branch across the lawn, sun-ripened berries drops . . .
Upon a seat, leaf blurred by shade, then Estelle's memory stops,
It seems so many lives away, lost, centuries before,
And yet the youth in Estelle's soul is yearning there once more. . .

"Love shall be ours," the lover said, "such as never yet you knew."
And Estelle saw a loyal heart, a faith untried and true;

A sheltered home, an ingle nook, far from all by-gone pain, Perhaps a little baby face to bring her peace again—Always a fending arm for her, thro' unknown days to be,
A manly breast for her brown head—What else did Estelle see?

Lost moons that wane o'er long lagoons—red stars in cloud-torn skies, And a fine scorn of woman's love, fixed in a dead man's eyes!

THE HONEY MOON.

A lattice, creeper twined, that opens wide and high;
One ragged wind-blown palm against an opal sky.
Beyond a line of white—the sand; a gleam of blue —the sea;
With shifting undertow of weed the waves make melody.
Now flames the West to sunset's pomp, now pales the vault above, Now droop the lids o'er wearied eyes that have grown wise in love.
Daylight has faded from the shore like Youth that flies too soon—
But o'er the silver water-way rises the Honey Moon.

ROADS THAT I REMEMBER.

Ah! The roads that I remember!

One was just a line of wheel tracks curving o'er a black soil plain,

Hard and dusty in the dry time, soft and sticky after rain,

Tussock grass beside it growing; wild weeds springing from the sod,

Winding to the hazy sky line, and the slate blue hills and God!

Deep ruts, shiny from the friction of the jolting spring cart wheels,

Faint impressions of the passing of a horse's unshod heels;

Or impatient deeper 'hoof marks stamped in by the homestead rail,

Where the pack horse paused a little to unload the cockies' mail.

Ah! The roads that I remember!

One led through a deep still scrubland; bottle trees, green crested, high,

Pale, full foliated lightwoods growing—brigalows blotting out the sky.

Wild grapes struggling o'er the leaf mould; Emu berries orange-red,

Emerald moss about the tree roots—grey moss swinging overhead;

Long, cool shadows, ground raked over by the quick scrub turkey's feet, Swaying creepers, scarlet fungi, climbing jasmine, starry, sweet,
Where the tawny dingo patters, or the scrubbers toss and stamp,
And where it is always gloaming by the timber-getter's camp.

Ah! The roads that I remember!
One led through the grey gums downward to a gap among the hills, Where the flood rains marked the ranges with a hundred tumbling rills, Where the long reeds rustled softly, by the steep banked billabong,
And a solemn kookaburra chattered out its laughing song;
Where, above their roots strong cabled, swam the lilies faintly blue,
And from glades of shrub and oat grass peeped an old man kangaroo;
Where the ridge was scarred and tortured by the searchers after lode,
On by hill, and swamp, and valley, ran the dear old station road!

Ah! The roads that I remember!
One led from the scattered township, bare and hard, rutted and brown, Slim and ghostly ring-barked timber marked the stock route to the town; Here the mobs of cattle hurried, when the water holes were low,

And with four grey sweating horses came the coach of Cobb and Co.; Here the ringers, after shearing, cantered in beneath the stars,
With a cheque or two to squander at the noisy township bars;
Here the bride and laughing bridegroom passed out with their merry train, Here the dead were slowly carried back to Mother Earth again.

Ah! The roads that I remember!
One was just a faint line shadowed on a lonely grassy rise, Where a glimpse of blue sea tumbling lured the seeker's tired eyes, Black rocks, and a dreary mudbank, where the tide-wet mangroves grow, But to me the best remembered of the roads I used to know!
Where the murmur of the rollers, breaking on the sandy bar, Mingles with the sudden crying of a curlew from afar;
Where round the spotted cowrie shells the sodden seaweeds twine, There Love forgot the peering world, and laid a hand on mine!

THE POSTER GIRL.

She hangs o'er the railway station, 'neath the haze of city skies,

haunted, human eyes,

(Red and yellow the colours crude, that clash in her tasteless dress),

Watching the slow "All Stations" down, and the whirl of the North Express;

All day long, 'tis her penance set for some bygone, easy sin,

To watch the Down train rattling out, or the Up train hissing in,

The city clerks and shop girls trim, the merchant or demi-monde,

Tramp and saunter, or flutter by, and mount to the steps beyond;

But thro' the night, when stars blink forth, and the swaying lanterns swirl,

She shivers on the wooden wall, the wraith of a poster girl!

About the stations on the line there are posters green and blue,

Simp'ring faces of poster girls—but never a girl like you!

The man who painted limned you not from a quick inventive brain,

Yours was a face burned on his heart by the red-hot lance of pain,

You were one whom he used to know full well in the seasons gone, Where lilies brush on blue lagoons the plumes of a sable swan;
Where in the dust of the blackbutt trees, many soft winged moths flit by,
And knit to grooves in warm brown earth, the mats of the mosses lie, Ah—was it hate that drew those eyes—was it love that loved too much?
Learning that chin by gaze intent—those lips by too close a touch?
Or, rememb'ring when gum boughs swayed to drone of a lazy breeze, How suns threw on the sanded path—a pattern of splash work trees;
Did he, taking a hated task, for a meagre livelihood, Recalling breaths of wattle-bloom, or of scattered sandalwood, (Knowing that Spring greened all the bush, and hearing the lost Springs moan), Paint the look he had taught to grow, in eyes that he once had known?

She hangs o'er the railway platform, 'neath haze of the city skies,
A poster girl with spreading skirts, and strange,
haunted, human eyes;
Yellow and red the draperies clash, that fashion her gaudy dress, Watching the slow "All Stations" down, or the rush of the North Express,

All day long. 'Tis the penance set for her's—or another's—sin,

To watch the Down trains sliding out, or the Up trains hissing in.

About the stations on the line there are posters old and new,

Simp'ring faces of poster girls—but never a girl like you!

MOON-TRYST.

A kiss on your brow;

For the hours that life has given to us—dreamful and happy—reckless or gay—

And one on your cheek for this moment snatched from the prim closed fingers of Everyday!

And one on the white of your perfect throat—

The moon to-night is a radiant boat,

That out into a sea of stars sets sail,

Thro' cloud, like a maid's communion veil—

To-night when I link my fingers so—

Just a little more—and your life shall go

In a last breath out of your parted lips—

But I pause—I loosen my finger tips

To answer the laugh that hangs in your eyes,

Defiant mockery—so woman-wise!

A kiss on your mouth!

For days that are bright as golden discs, new-minted coinage a King might spend,

And for nights that are fine as rounded pearls, from moon-white circle to clasped end!

THE CALL OF THE NORTH.

A creaking crane and a swinging weight, the moist, hot dark about us,
And the laugh of a girl from the prow, with mirth that seems to flout us;
And over there, where the crouching rock, lion like, leans o'er the town,
The reds and greens of the signal light, from the slender spar look down; And here and there on the sleeping deck lies a gleaming shaft of white, Here and there the long soft shadow creeps on the pathway of the light, Where the mighty engines wake and stir, hid under the polished wood,
The shadows cover your drooping head, just as though they understood.
A whistle cuts thro' the wide black night, as the train slides o'er the rail, The last train out from the sleeping town, with its midnight load of mail;
And overhead, in one swift red spark, a meteor spurns the sky,
And a voice that seems a spirit thing, trails faint in a last "Good-bye!"
A slack chain swings, and a rope drags past, and the pulsing engines beat,
The shore bell jangles above the thud and the rush of naked feet,

And fair and far in the oily wash of the tide that draws us forth, One white crest lifts in the sheeted gloom of that deep curved bay up North.

I have left behind the jetty wharf, and the hulls of the waiting ships,
My hand still warm from another's hand, my lips from another's lips;
And Magnetic Island, on the left, seems a menace in the night, While dwindle aft, o'er the churning waves, the gems of the Signal light.
I have left behind the long brown beach, with its haunting tropic charm, The Chapel hidden among the trees, and the ragged groves of palm;
I have left behind the red-streaked rock, and the still pandanus glade, The mango trees o'er the paling fence, with their great unbroken shade;
The tamarinds in the garden plot, and the cannias on the rise,
The bougainvillae's regal-red, and the millk white orchids' eyes.
To the citied South have set my face, as the rocking boat speeds forth,
And yet the cry in my soul to-day, is a cry for the green-isled North!

THE CORNER SHOP.

That is the little house where Death slipped in last night,

A sordid, corner shop, with one step grooved and white,

Where, from its high front window, tall, fly-specked lollie jars,

Stare at the street, and catch a glint of colour from the cars.

The blue-eyed doll in pink and green, the lucky packets gay;

The sticky squares of chewing gum that melt along the tray;

A Christmas stocking, bright with sweets, behind its stiffened net,

The small surroundings of a life one thinks Death might forget!

One feels he might have let it be—gone higher up the street—

Where green slats temper dust and glare, and pride and riches meet.

To-day, beside the footpath, that fronts the little shop,

I heard the rattling pauper's cart, and saw the horses stop;

I saw the plain deal coffin, that held the perished clay,

And heard a woman sobbing her very heart away. . .

A flock of noisy sparrows, food searching, in the road, Flew, chirping, from the beating hoofs that bore the silent load;
I heard a heavy dragging step move o'er the sunken floor,
And through the mutter of the town, the closing of a door.
The window blinks out on the street, as it blinked yesterday, But now an awful peace lies on the house across the way;
A silence, that is all of God, broods on the door-step white,
About the little sordid shop, where Death slipped in last night.

THE OUTPOST.

A line of hills, a sudden spurt of flame,
A crackling volley, and from whence it came A stirring—as of leaves upon the tree,
When pale September buds drift silently.
The sky is blue and smiling overhead, Above a tumbled heap of brown and red;
And thro' the yellow stems of long, dry grass,
A startled train of searching black ants pass.
They do not fear, so quietly he lies,
They climb above the sightless staring eyes;
Across the lips a woman loved of yore.
This is the Red God's harvest—this is war!

FINALE.

We were not friends in the long ago,
Let us be honest and give the truth,
You liked me not, and I liked you not,
And the blood of youth is quick and hot, Ay! The dear, warm blood of youth!

But, now for the sake of the old feud,
With palsied hand and uncertain eye,
Draw on the glove that we used to fling, Strip off the armour of plate and ring, Lay the rusted rapier by!

Draw your lean knees to my leaping fire,
Here, side by side, let us nod and sup,
I will mix a brew—spicy and fine,
But fear no measure of poisoned wine,
From out of the loving cup!

Do you remember how white she was?
And the blue of the veins on her neck;
The breast kissed close by a ruddy curl,
The soft, slim shape of an unwed girl . . .
The shame of the after-wreck?

Good lack! To have lived to tire of her!
To see her grow grey, and gaunt and thin,
To hear her sweet voice ring peevishly,
To see her eyes look their fear of me,
From the mask of her faded skin!

Long have I buried the thoughts of love,
The toothless lion will seek no mate . . .
The back grows bent, the fires grow cold, But, odds life! I must, indeed, be old,
When I can no longer hate!

NO RECORD.

"There is no record of this period of his life." From a Biography.

Mountains, lifting rosy foreheads to the greeting of the sun, Pine-edged paths, and mists in valleys, when the brief, bright day is done; Shepherds, yod'ling by the ice-clefts, and, where red-tiled hamlets lie, Star-like windows nightly wond'ring at their rivals in the sky.

Deserts, white to vague horizons; buried cities in the sand, Tawny-bodied lions slinking thro' a waste of moonlit land;
One green palm, against a gateway, crumbling into bygone things,
And the busy lizards sporting o'er the resting-place of kings.

Tropic forests where the vines swing, olive-spans from tree to tree, Where the wind in creaking branches mocks the murmur of the sea; Where the pale-faced orchids cluster, and the tulipbud pricks red,
And a honey-comb of leafwork shuts the blue out overhead.

Grassy plains that break in daisies, when the autumn rain is o'er; Buttercups, like golden buttons, sewn along the earth's brown floor; Blue smoke, trailing by the ridges, where the moth-grey tents are set, When the ranges down the river change from dun to violet.

Birch canoes above the rapids, green and tangled, silent ways—Did the dead man keep, I wonder, any annals of those days?
Did he ever smile in secret, he who seemed to court the day, Thinking of a twilit corner, more than half a world away?

Did one other share his wand'ring, by vast mountain, sea, or plain, Sepulchre the perfect mem'ries, in a picture-haunted brain?
Amber beads, loose-strung together, do they lie those yellow noons, Covered in some heart's still corner, by the discs of faded moons?

Perhaps his grave mind, undetected, housed some lurking woodland elf, Hugging his imp-soul for keeping one whole twelvemonth to himself.
How the light is focussed on it—every leaf of life—save one—
That in cool, green shadow slumbers, while the rest are scorched by sun!

DUSK.

It is growing dark; by the blurred belar,
There climbs and climbs ever a white-faced star,
Like the dwindled soul of some long dead moon, Whose reflex once laughed in the low lagoon.

It is growing dark; o'er the open plain Fades the last spilled red of the sunset's stain, And where Night low crouched, on the ranges springs,

Comes the sudden rushing of unseen wings.

It is growing dark, where the brown boat drifts Thro' the drooping greens of the willow rifts, Winding mists steal up from the couch of Day, Where the red and gold have alike turned grey.

It is growing dark; at the branding yard,
Where the moist black soil is hoof-beaten hard,
And the bark-stripped gums stand up stiff and tall, Comes the organ-note of the cattle call.

It is growing dark; in the station home,
Where the yucca blooms are like scattered foam,
And the trees bend low to the fondling night,
There strikes o'er the grasses a shaft of light.

It is growing dark; we must turn the boat Shoreward now, where the lilac lilies float,
And we must not pause at the landing place,
The heart sees too much when night hides the face!

It is growing dark; and 'twere best to go Back to prudent ways, and the lamplight's glow, Lest, while blushing Day to Night's dusk arms slips Warm lips in the dark should find warmer lips!

It is growing dark; lift the dripping oar,
A long, rippling sweep—and we make the shore;
A brief hand clasp—then your dress gleams white On the curving path, as we say "Good night!"

BOY-DREAMS.

I was a Pirate once,
A blustering fellow with scarlet sash,
A ready cutlass and language rash,
From a ship with a rum-filled water-tank,
I made the enemy walk the plank;
I marooned a man on an island bare,
And seized his wife by her long, dark hair;
Took treasure, such heaps of it!—wealth untold—Bright bars of silver and chunks of gold!
Till my ship was choked to the decks with pelf,
And no one dare touch it except myself!
And my black flag waved to the tearing breeze,
And I was the terror of all the seas!

I was a Fairy once.
I swung in the boughs of the Silky Oak,
And the harebells rang to the words I spoke,
And my wings were fashioned of silver-gauze,
And I knew no grief and no human laws.
And I lived where the laces of green leaves sway,
And my life was one long, long holiday.
No tasks to learn, and no bothering rules,
No hectoring Grown-ups, and no—more—schools.
But a dance each eve, 'neath the moon's cold light,

To sit up as late as I liked at night . . .
For a lance I carried a grass-blade green,
And my shield was cut from an olivine;
I sipped cool dewes from the cups of flowers,
My days were threaded of happy hours!

I was a Merman once.

In the gloom of the amber-tinted seas,
With the brown tang clinging about my knees,
With a coral house, and a crab to ride,
Who pranced and who ambled from side to side,
I wooed a Mermaid with emerald hair, Dragged the fierce sea-serpent from out his lair, With his flaming tongue and his awful might,
And I slew him—easy—in open fight!
I had strings of pearls—white as frozen milk;
That were strung for me on sea-spider's silk;
And I never pined for the upper skies, Whose blue came down in the dead men's eyes, Drowned men with the salt on their blackened lips,
Who slid, drifting in, from the wrecks of ships.
But I took the gold from the belts of all,
To pave the road to my coral hall.

I was a Hunter once.

And I trapped and stalked in a pathless wood,
And the talk of the Wild Things understood.
With my leather leggings and hat of brown,
I tracked the elk and the redskin down;
Slew a grizzly bear in a mountain cave,
And tweaked the nose of an Indian Brave, Ere I shot the rapids in birch canoe—
For there was nothing I could not do.
There was naught I did not dare nor enjoy,
In the magic world of a dreaming boy!
